Welcome attendees!

- Financial empowerment is a popular buzzword these days, but what exactly does it mean? It means taking charge of your own financial future. Taking charge doesn’t necessarily mean acting alone, however. Friends, family members, advocates and policy makers can provide valuable assistance. But taking charge does require educating oneself about financial matters. This is the goal of today’s conference – providing financial education for people with disabilities and opening up the conversation around how we can make these tools more available moving forward. All of you at this conference either have a disability, are family members of people with disabilities, work with people with disabilities, or make policy on disability issues. For these reasons, this conference should be meaningful for you.

- When this conference is over, you will have learned about some key topics – money mapping, safe ways to save, protecting eligibility for government benefits, the ABLE program, work incentives, resources for additional financial education, and transitioning to adulthood. The conference will also identify times when providing financial education to people with disabilities is particularly useful.

- We hope you enjoy this conference, and that you come away with the knowledge you need to take charge of your own financial future, and to help others do the same.

Sincerely yours,

Susan Tachau
